

Watch out for the locks and doors

Equip the rooms in your home to be safely accessed in an emergency and be able to open doors for elders (or even children) when they can't.

There is a difference between privacy and safety. Locks are often fitted to bathroom doors to prevent interruption, but these installations should not become a barrier when a safety need arises. This is especially true in households with elderly or young family members. A simple accident or a fall in a home bathroom can become a bigger problem if help can't get in.

Give yourself or an elder living at home both respect and safety by installing simple, specialized door hardware solutions. Installing a lock that can be opened from both sides offers a simple option. A more advanced solution enables a door to swing both ways when something or someone who has fallen blocks the door from opening inward. This can easily happen in smaller bathroom spaces like those in Hong Kong. A door equipped with a dual swing feature can also make access much easier for people with walkers.
